

Oda Tungodden | In the Wake

"I thought I would walk out and feel the fresh air and the sunlight on my skin. And my whole body would feel that tingling sensation of aliveness. I thought I would put on my shoes and run. I thought of the sun setting over the horizon. I thought of the strangeness that is to be. I thought so many things in my mind."

In this body of work, small and intimate portraits of runners appear alongside landscapes that drift between figuration and dissolution. Surfaces build slowly through layers of paint, added and partially removed, revealing traces of earlier states beneath. Time becomes visible in the process itself: quick gestures in the portraits capture fleeting expressions, while the landscapes unfold through slower accumulations and erasures. Forms surface and recede, never fully settling. Like the title In the Wake, the paintings inhabit a state of ongoing disturbance - the subtle movement that remains after motion has passed, when the surface is still unsettled and new images continue to emerge.
